The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe

- Lucy: It's a beaver.
- Peter: Here, boy... Here boy!
- Mr Beaver: I ain't gonna smell it if that's what you want!
- Peter: Oh Sorry!
- Mr Beaver: Lucy Pevensie?
- Lucy: Yes. Hey, that's the hankie I gave to Mr T...
- Mr Beaver: Tumnus. He got it to me just before they took him.
- Lucy: Is he alright?
- Mr Beaver: Further in.
- Susan: What are you doing?
- Edmund: She's right. How do we know we can trust him?
- Peter: He said he knows the faun.
- Susan: He's a beaver... he shouldn't be saying anything!
- Mr Beaver: Everything alright?
- Peter: Yes. We were just talking.
- Mr Beaver: That's better left for safer quarters.
- Lucy: He means the trees.

The Day After Tomorrow

- Jack: The northern hemisphere owes its temperate climate to the North Atlantic current. Heat from the sun arrives at the equator and is carried north by the ocean. But, global warming is melting the polar ice caps and disrupting this flow. Eventually it will shut down and when that occurs... there goes our warm climate.
- Delegate: Excuse me, when do you think this could happen, Professor? When?
- Jack: I don't know. Maybe in 100 years. Maybe in 1000. But what I do know is if that we do not act soon it is our children and our grandchildren who will have to pay the price.
- US Vice President: And who's going to pay the price of the Kyoto Accord? It would cost the world's economy hundreds of billions of dollars.
- Jack: With all due respect, Mr Vice President, the cost of doing nothing could be even higher. Our climate is fragile, At the rate we're burning fossil fuels and polluting the environment, the ice caps will soon disappear.
- US Vice President: Professor Hall, our economy is every bit as fragile as the environment. Perhaps you should keep that in mind before making sensationalist claims
- Jack: Well, the last chunk of ice that broke off was about the size of the state of Rhode Island. Some people might call that pretty sensational.
